The first draft of this book took shape during the spring semester of 2014, when I taught a course entitled Technology and Warfare in the history curriculum at the United States Military Academy at West Point. My students in that course were Taylor Allen, McKenzie Beasley, Jonathan Crucitti, Morgan Dennison, Robert Fee, Jacob Fountain, Lucas Hodge, Bryan Houpp, Alex Kukharsky, James O'Keefe, Alexander Reeves, Travis Smith, and Douglas Taylor. I am grateful to all of them for sharpening my thinking on this topic, revealing what worked and did not work, and challenging me at every turn to be clearer and more interesting. This book may not achieve all that they wanted, but it is better for their inputs.

I imposed upon four good friends, distinguished scholars all, to read a draft of this manuscript and share their impressions with me. Daniel Headrick, Wayne Lee, Matthew Moten, and Everett Wheeler all read the manuscript closely and insightfully, offered helpful suggestions, and saved me from many errors of omission and commission that I would have been embarrassed to publish. Wayne Lee was especially helpful in that he had just covered much of the same ground in far greater detail in his masterful Waging War: Conflict, Culture, and Innovation in World History (Oxford University Press, 2016). Three anonymous, external reviewers recruited by Oxford University Press provided constructive
