POLITICAL COMMUNICATION IN EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS

Just before this book was sent to press, Lynda Lee Kaid sadly passed away. For us and for many others, this was a tragic loss. Lynda Lee Kaid was not only a distinguished and highly productive scholar who helped to train numerous other scholars, a pioneer in advancing collaborative and comparative political communication research, and a close colleague. She was also a friend and a mentor, always there to provide support, advice and encouragement when needed.

We have benefited greatly from working with her, and our debt and gratitude towards her is enormous. This book is dedicated to the memory of Lynda Lee Kaid.

Acknowledgements

For such endeavors as the research projects which are presented in the chapters of this volume, as well as for the book project as such, three resources are essential: Sponsors who are willing to support research, collaboration, joint working sessions and publications; colleagues who are willing to cooperate and invest time and engagement in the projects; and several helping hands in the background. In the case of this book, we thus want to thank the Swedish Stiftelsen Riksbankens Jubileumsfond, which funded our first research meeting in July 2008, in Sigtuna, Sweden, and the Fritz-Thyssen-Foundation and the Ministry of Education, Science, Youth and Culture Rhineland-Palatina, which sponsored our International Symposium “Campaigning for Europe” in October 2009 in Landau, Germany. This book is one important outcome from these working sessions and presentations, and it would not have been possible without the financial resources provided by these sponsors.

We also want to thank the many colleagues who were involved in the different research collaborations regarding the 2009 European Parliament elections that are represented in this book. Without their interest, support and hard work, the research projects would also not have been possible. Other publications will follow in different outlets, and we also wish to thank those colleagues who worked with us and whose research is not represented in this volume. We especially want to thank Jens Tenscher, whose idea the “Campaigning in Europe”-symposia in 2004 and 2009 were, and with whom it has been a pleasure to collaborate with.

The number of helping hands in the background is almost endless, as in many of our projects. However, we specifically would like to thank Karin Stengel and Bärbel Ruzika, who helped organize our research meetings, as well as Ramona Teich, Simone Wind, Eleonore Hertweck and June Findlay who did a great job helping to edit this volume.

Last but not least, we also want to thank Natalja Mortensen at Ashgate Publishing, who believed in this book project from the very beginning and who has been very supportive and helpful throughout the process. Special thanks also belongs to Adam Guppy who did the editing with us. It has been a great pleasure working together with both of you.

Political Communication and Election Campaigns for the European Parliament

Jesper Strömbäck, Michaela Maier, and Lynda Lee Kaid

Introduction

Without political communication, there is no democracy. Democracy and political communication are inextricably linked, on the local as well as the regional, national, and transnational level. As suggested by Blumler and Gurevitch (1975: pp. 167–8):

If politics is about power, the holder's possession of and readiness to exercise it must in some manner be conveyed to those expected to respond to it. [...] If politics is about the legitimization of supreme authority, then the values and procedural norms of regimes have to be symbolically expressed, and the acts of government have to be justified in broad popular terms. And if politics is about choice, then information flows clarifying alternative policy options must circulate to those concerned with decisions, whether as their shapers or as consumers of their consequences.

Similarly, if politics is about popular participation or the representation of the will of the people, then participation ultimately consists of, while the representation of people requires, communication.

This is true both between and during election campaigns, although the importance of political communication may be even more obvious during campaigns than otherwise. Not only do political parties and candidates increase their efforts at communicating with the electorate, directly or through advertising or the news media, but the media devote greater attention to politics during election campaigns. In addition, the outcome of political communication may be particularly consequential, as it will help shape people's votes, which in turn will decide the allocation of power and policymaking over the next term.

Political communication and election research have consequently been closely intertwined ever since the 1940s and the publication of the classic People's Choice study (Lazarsfeld, Berelson, and Gaudet, 1948), and reviews suggest that election campaigns remain the single most important theme in political communication research (Blumler and McQuail, 2001; Graber, 2005).
