KARL BORCHARDT works in the Department of History at the University of Würzburg and researches into the religious orders, for example, the Celestinians, and German regional history. His publications include a book on medieval ecclesiastical institutions at Rothenburg ob der Tauber (1988). He is currently preparing a study on the Hospitallers in central Europe in collaboration with Dr Anthony Luttrell.

DIETER HECKMANN studied at the universities of Saarbrücken and St Etienne sur Loire, and is Archivist at the Geheimes Staatsarchiv, Berlin. He researches into town history and the regional history of Lorraine, Prussia, and Livonia. His publications include Von Königsberg an die Loire. Quellen zur Handelsreise des herzoglich-preußischen Faktors Antoine Maillet nach Frankreich in den Jahren 1562 bis 1564 (1993).

LIBOR JAN is Lecturer in History at the Department of History in the Faculty of Philosophy, University of Masaryk, Brno, Czech Republic. He researches into the military orders in Bohemia and the history of Moravia in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and is currently preparing a book on the administrative history of Moravia. His publications include a history of the cathedral chapter of Brno.

NIKOLAS JASPERT is Lecturer in Medieval History at the Friedrich-Alexander-Universität in Erlangen-Nürnberg. He is the author of Stift und Stadt. Das Heiliggrabpriorat von Santa Anna und das Regularkanonikerstift Santa Eulàlia del Camp im mittelalterlichen Barcelona, 1145-1423 (1996) and articles on the medieval history of Spain, the Crusader States and the Kingdom of Sicily.

ANTHONY LUTTRELL studied at Oxford, Madrid, Rome and Pisa, taught at Swarthmore College in Pennsylvania, Edinburgh, Malta and Padua, and was Assistant Director and Librarian of the British School at Rome. He works and publishes extensively on the Hospitallers of Rhodes, on medieval Malta, on the English in the Levant, and on various archaeological projects.

KLAUS MILITZER is Professor of Medieval History at the University of Bochum. His publications on the military orders centre particularly upon the history of the Teutonic Order in Germany, Prussia and Livonia, and include Die Entstehung der Deutschordensballeien im Deutschen Reich (1981) and Ritter- brüder im livländischen Zweig des Deutschen Ordens (1993) (with Lutz Fencke).

JOHANNES A. MOL is Research Fellow at the Fryske Akademy in Leeuwarden. His works on the medieval history of Frisia set aside, he published a monograph and several articles on the military orders in the Netherlands. He is currently preparing a book on monasteries and society in medieval Frisia.

BERNHARD NEIDIGER is Archivist at the Stadtarchiv, Stuttgart, and works on the history of religious orders, especially the Observant movement and its intellectual history. His articles and books include Das Dominikanerkloster Stuttgart, die Kanoniker vom gemeinsamen Leben in Urach und die Gründung der Universität Tübingen. Konkurrierende Reformansätze in der württembergischen Kirchenpolitik am Ausgang des Mittelalters (1993).

HELEN NICHOLSON is Lecturer in Medieval History at the University of Wales, Cardiff, and works on the military orders and various related subjects. Her most recent book is Chronicle of the Third Crusade: a Translation of the Itinerarium Peregrinorum et Gesta Regis Ricardi (1997).

ANNELI RANDLA studied at Cambridge and is currently Academic Secretary of the Institute of Art History of the Estonian Academy of Arts, and Researcher in the Estonian Art Museum. She works on the architecture of the mendicant orders in Northern Europe; her most recent publication is an article on the Dominicans in Livonia.

JENS RÖHRKASTEN is Lecturer in History in the Department of Medieval History at the University of Birmingham. His areas of research are criminal law in the Middle Ages and the history of the mendicant orders in England. Among his publications are Die englischen Kronzeugen, 1130-1330 (1990) and various articles on mendicants.

ANDREAS RÜTHER is Lecturer in Medieval History at the Justus-Liebig-Universität Gießen. He currently works on politics, society and church in Silesia in the later Middle Ages. His publications include Bettelorden in Stadt und Land. Die Straßburger Mendikanten und das Elsaß im Spätmittelalter (1997).

JÜRGEN SARNOWSKY is Professor of Medieval History at the University of Hamburg. His main fields of study are the military orders, the history of medieval Prussia and scholastic thought, and he is now editor of the journal Beiträge zur Geschichte Westpreußens. He is currently preparing a book on the administrative and constitutional history of the Hospitallers on fifteenth-century Rhodes.

Editor's Preface

The idea of investigating the problems implicit in the regional and local settings of the mendicant and military orders was conceived during a visit to London in 1996, where I met my friend Jens Röhrkasten from the University of Birmingham. We decided to organize two sessions for the 1997 International Medieval Conference in Leeds, one on mendicants and one on military orders. Most of the papers collected in this volume originally were presented at that conference: those of Bernhard Neidiger, Andreas Rüther, Anthony Luttrell, Karl Borchardt, Jens Röhrkasten, and myself in the sessions mentioned above; those of Klaus Militzer, Libor Jan, and Johannes Mol in a session on the Teutonic Knights organized by Klaus Militzer, and that of Helen Nicholson in another session. Due to organizational problems there were two additional papers for the session on military orders which are also printed here, those of Nikolas Jaspert and Dieter Heckmann; and I asked Anneli Randla for her paper in order to have one more article on mendicants and at least one contribution on art history. I wish to thank all of the contributors as well as the organizers of the sessions for agreeing to publish their respective papers in this collection; their contributions made it possible to examine a wide range of problems.

Concerning the production of the book my personal thanks go to Jens Röhrkasten, who also helped me with the translation of Bernhard Neidiger's paper, and especially to Edith Pawlik, who translated Libor Jan's contribution and helped to revise the introduction, my own paper, and the conclusion. I also wish to thank John Smedley, Ruth Peters and Caroline Cornish of Ashgate Publishing for their support and helpful suggestions.

Regional Problems in the History of the Mendicant and Military Orders

Jürgen Sarnowsky

In the first age of church reform leading up to the Investiture Contest – roughly the tenth to the twelfth centuries – the old, established monastic institutions underwent a process of reformation and reorganization aimed at renewing the Benedictine ideal and establishing new methods to control observance of the rule in individual monasteries, as may be seen in the foundation and spread of the Cluniac community in the tenth century as well as in that of the Cistercian Order in the twelfth.¹ In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, new forms of orders developed whose aims and goals required more complex internal organization, namely the military and the mendicant orders.

The military orders were founded in the course of the crusades to improve the security of pilgrims in the Holy Land as in the case, for example, of the Templars, who are thought to have been knights in the service, or at least the entourage, of the Patriarch of Jerusalem before they formed a separate community in about 1119.² Their distinguishing characteristic was their synthesis of the monastic vows of obedience, poverty, and chastity with a commitment to the defence of Christianity against the infidel. Other orders were originally founded in conjunction with hospitals, and the brethren of these orders, including the Hospitallers and the Teutonic Knights, undertook not only the defence of Christians and their property in the Holy Land but also the care of sick, poor, or elderly pilgrims.³ In contrast, the mendicant orders developed in response to the twelfth-century criticism of the wealth and moral decline of ecclesiastical institutions which had led to discontent and the spread of heresy, particularly in southern France and northern Italy, where the Dominicans and the Franciscans originated. The mendicant ideal was a life of poverty and the imitation of Christ and the Apostles; preaching, missionary work, and the cure of souls were their main objectives. From their inception, and in contrast to other orders, the mendicants focused their work on towns and intended to support themselves through begging and the collection of alms. A special study-system designed to provide younger brethren with the skills and knowledge necessary to fulfil their tasks was soon developed and became an essential element of the orders' identity.⁴

In the mendicant and military orders, brethren from all over Christian Europe were working together to reach their orders' aims and goals, and everyone could be sent anywhere in accordance with their superior's orders. While the older monastic orders, in accordance with the ideal of stabilitas loci,⁵ normally required their members to remain at the monastery which they had originally entered, the brethren of the military orders and the mendicant friars thus moved frequently from one place to another. For the military orders, who had to secure the supply of men and materials for the struggle against the infidel when and wherever necessary, this was primarily a question of logistics,⁶ whereas for the mendicants, with a hierarchy of educational institutions ranging from local centres to 'general studies' most often associated with the universities,⁷ it took the form of rotation among the various houses according to the needs of the community and the abilities of the brethren in question.

The co-ordination of the orders' aims thus required highly developed internal structures with strong central elements. While the military orders had their headquarters first in the Holy Land (and Spain) and later on Cyprus, Rhodes, and in Prussia, the mendicants placed themselves in or near the sphere of action of their founders or at the Roman curia. Unlike the organizational structures of older monastic institutions with their essentially monarchic character – the Cistercians, who formed an association of monasteries under the authority of the abbots of Cîteaux and the four oldest daughter houses are a good example of the type – those of the military and mendicant orders contained both oligarchic and representative elements. Although these orders were led by a master, grand master, master-general, prior-general, or general minister, there were other brethren in office who influenced the orders' policies as well, and all of these were overseen by the chapters general. These met regularly and – at least partially – consisted not only of officials, but of 'simple brethren' from the orders' houses and provinces as well. These houses formed the lowest administrative level and served as the orders' bases of operations, and were themselves divided into provinces governed by provincial officials and provincial chapters which also exhibited representative elements, while central institutions at least partially, and sometimes regularly, controlled the admission of brethren, promotion to office, and the policies of the orders as a whole.⁸

The complex internal structures of the mendicant and the military orders made them more ‘international’ than the older orders, a tendency which was further reinforced by the fact that the orders were in most cases under papal protection (and control) and thus exempted from episcopal jurisdiction. While such exemption was first granted to the Cluniac community, its implications in the case of the more powerful military and mendicant orders was much further-reaching. In theory and – though not always effectively – in practice, these orders acted as military and spiritual arms of the papacy, the only one of the two universal powers of the Middle Ages which succeeded in maintaining its position until the beginning of the sixteenth century.⁹

The supranational character of the mendicant and the military orders contrasted with their local, regional, and ‘national’ foundations. Since they were dependent on the supply of members and donations and on the goodwill and privileges of the ruling classes at the local, regional, and ‘national’ levels, different channels of influence were opened up. In the early stages of their development, the orders needed the support of local rulers, the nobility, and the townspeople to establish themselves in the various regions of Europe and to create a basis for their operations. Once they had accumulated larger possessions or gained a position of influence, the orders invited interference from local and regional powers, bishops, towns, the nobility, and kings, all of whom sought to strengthen their rule or their standing by gaining control over ecclesiastical institutions and their properties, often by hinting that their ancestors had given large donations. Emperors and popes also tried to use the orders’ power to their own advantage in their mutual struggles. While it was not unusual for members of a mendicant or military order to be in the service of kings, nobles, or towns because of their military or intellectual skills, they had to act carefully in order to avoid conflicts of loyalty. The orders’ dependence upon local rulers, other ecclesiastical institutions, and social and ethnic groups became especially marked in border regions, where often even the orders’ properties were shaped according to local structures and spheres of influence.

But the ‘international’ character of the mendicant and military orders also led to internal difficulties. Problems arose between members of varying origins living together in the orders’ houses and among different regional or ‘national’ groups within the orders, and it is likely that these increased with the growing ‘nationalism’ of the later medieval period. Divisions of property which came about accidentally when an order’s province boundaries were drawn might necessitate special arrangements. In this respect, external factors played an important role, as well: local traditions, ‘national’ identities and conflicts, and economic factors, particularly those resulting from the economic difficulties of the later Middle Ages, were influential in moulding the orders’ internal structures and in carving out their provinces, and in some cases even contributed to their dissolution. And while custom and to some degree regulations provided norms for the design of the orders’ buildings and equipment, regional and ‘national’ differences resulted in the development of varying styles in the art and architecture commissioned by the orders.

In a recent article, Kaspar Elm described the military orders as a form of ‘religious life between universalism and particularism’.¹⁰ The same holds true for the mendicants. It is perhaps due to the complexity of the problems involved that no comparative and systematic approach to this subject yet exists. Nonetheless, historians have explored many aspects of the problem in recent years. Particularly of note here is the Polish-German volume on ‘military orders and region’, published in 1995,¹¹ which examines the relationships between the areas of recruiting and operation, between orders and towns, and orders and the regional nobility, and which describes the regional organization of the military orders. And in his brief study on ‘Europe and region – conflicting forces in the development of the Teutonic Knights’, Udo Arnold advances the hypothesis of a mid fourteenth-century shift in the order’s structures: while the rule and extension of the order’s houses retained their European character, regional factors played an ever greater role in daily life.¹²

Though generalization is difficult, it is clear that European regionalism was an important factor in the history of all military and mendicant orders. The history of individual houses and provinces and the related aspects of the orders as a whole have been well researched. Numerous articles and monographs have been devoted to the history of the military orders on the Iberian Peninsula,¹³ in and last but not least the ‘internationality’ of some of the orders’ houses has also received some attention.³¹

This survey of research on the military and mendicant orders is far from comprehensive, and, accordingly, it will not be possible to investigate all of the problems caused by the different aspects of European regionalism in a single book. The following contributions are therefore intended only to examine some examples of the developments which have been outlined here. The essays in the first section are devoted to border regions where elements of local and regional influence are particularly evident; those in the second section of the book will examine different levels of influence, starting with that of popes and emperors and continuing down to that of nobles, bishops, and towns. Finally, the essays in the last section will explore the internal consequences of local and regional influences: the ‘international’ character of some of the orders’ houses, changes in internal structure, and the architecture employed by the orders.

Bonds and Tensions on the Frontier: the Templars in Twelfth-Century Western Catalonia

Nikolas Jaspert

The emergence of new religious orders sparked wide-ranging changes in the areas where they were established – economic, social, religious, cultural, ecclesiastical, sometimes political, even technological or artistic changes. Young foundations had to struggle to find their place in pre-existing ecclesiastical contexts, both among the ruling groups and their feudal overlords. They also broke into established economic structures, often with significant consequences. Whilst this is true for religious orders in general, the type of institution under examination here, the international military orders, also had to define their position in other respects. First, they played an active role in the military field; second, they were institutionally subordinate to the needs and interests of their mother-houses in a way unequalled by most other religious institutions, which made it particularly difficult to incorporate them into political and ecclesiastical structures. The impact of the military orders on medieval society was consequently especially broad.

But does this finding also hold true for the fringes of Christendom, for border and frontier areas?¹ Here, civil and ecclesiastical structures were often poorly developed, and antagonism between newcomers and those already established was less likely. One could expect that on the frontier – with its frequent military conflicts and its ample means for expansion – the bonds that tied the medieval military orders to other institutions and powers were less rigid, tensions amongst Christians less frequent. One such border region where the Ordines militares in general and the Order of the Temple in particular took action was the Iberian Peninsula,² the only part of Europe where the Templars exercised functions similar to those in the Levant.

West of the Pyrenees, particularly in Aragon and Catalonia, the knights not only possessed extensive landed property, a series of preceptories and important fortresses, but also held lordship over towns and participated actively in campaigns against the Muslims of al-Andalus. They were essential to the Hispanic frontiers. As areas of contact and confrontation alike, these zonas fronterizas were not only defined by their function of political and military borders, but also by their character as areas of settlement and of social, cultural, and economic interaction.³ In all these fields, the military orders, and more specifically
